Disaster at the Pleasance Building Dr. Valiant Calms the City

by Ida May Weinstein

The Pleasance Building in the Financial District was placed under a strict quarantine and many workers are missing and presumed dead. The city's champion, Dr. Timothy Valiant acted quickly to seal the building off and neutralize the menace, preventing wide-scale harm to the city. Dr. Valiant explained that unknown terrorists has released a poison gas in the building's ventilation, but that his team has neutralized the toxin. While Valiant is unwilling to speculate on the nature of the attack, to this reporter it seems like a clear case of industrial negligence by the Waynes, Elliots or Cobblepots have again endangered our city.

Rash of Arsons Sweep City

by Harry Lipshitz

Over the last few weeks, a series of arsons have been committed across Gotham. Police refuse to consider that they are related, but the repeated use of massive amounts of jellied gasoline and other accelerants seem to argue otherwise. The Grand Haberdasherium suffered significant damage and will be closed for weeks. A cab, belonging to Isuzu Wakasashi was destroyed in its overnight lot. The house of Mildred Johnson, mother of the late Walter Johnson, was burnt to the ground. Noted scientist Dr. Marcel Mattieu is in the hospital with extensive burns over 75% of his body. This menace must be stopped!

Local Professor Leaves for Expedition

by Ida May Weinstein

Dr. Louis Maelstrom, rising star of the Gotham University History Department, is leaving to join an archaeological expedition in Western Mexico. The expedition, underwritten by friend-of-Gotham Kermit Roosevelt, is meant to examine the remains of a lost city, said to be a colony of the sunken civilization of Lemuria. Dr. Maelstrom believes that real evidence of Lemuria would significantly advance our knowledge of the rise of modern civilization. Dr. Hans Gruberman, of the Philosophical Ascent To Atlantis, comments that Lemuria is a myth, and the scientific mind only focuses on Atlantis.
